

stopping drug abuse or in achieving social rehabilitation. The types of patients treated are in most cases poorly defined, and few programs have reported any data describing the fate of patients after return to the community. The prospects for improvement in data collection seem remote unless basic standards are adopted.

We propose that the directors of all major treatment programs join in sponsoring an impartial committee to set standards for systematic reporting of treatment data, and for evaluation of results. The standards should insure collection of data to measure the persistence of drug abuse (as shown by systematic analyses of urine for narcotics, barbiturates, and amphetamines), the patient's progress in social rehabilitation, his physical health, and the average per capita cost (as measured in dollars and in the amount of professional services required).

We have developed standard forms for tabulation of data in our program, and have simplified the technic of urine testing. We would be glad to make these technics available to any interested program or evaluation group.
